BRIEFING ON EDUCATION

news, training and services to make your business prosper

July 22 • noon • Elizabeth's Restaurant • Sanford

Nobody needs to tell you what pressures businesses face in our technologically-driven, hypercompetitive environment. Controlling costs is essential. Adopting new technology, another critical piece of the puzzle.

But one thing's for certain: Without quality education and workforce training, we won't have the people to make it happen.

We hear about education all the time, usually when news breaks about the latest test scores or someone has a complaint.

But do you know what changes our local schools and community college are making right now to prepare better workers?

And what about services they offer to make your work easier and help your business succeed — things like school-employer partnerships or Career Readiness Certification?

In "Briefing On Education," Jeff Moss, superintendent of Lee County Schools, and Stelfanie Williams, vice president for economic and community development at Central Carolina Community College, will give you the latest on educational innovation and offerings designed to strengthen local industry. And, they'll answer your questions, one-on-one, in a forum designed to find solutions for challenges we all face.

JEFF MOSS, Ed.D., became superintendent of Lee County Schools in January and currently serves on the Career-Ready Commission for the state superintendent of education. He began his career as a vocational teacher and has served in various roles overseeing curriculum, instruction and technology.

STELFANIE WILLIAMS manages programs in workforce development and industry services for Central Carolina Community College, one of the state's larger campuses. She also serves on several boards, including the North Carolina Community College System Economic and Workforce Development Leadership Committee.
